Silk cocoon

The cocoon is composed of silk that is made in glands within the body of the silkworm. In commercial silk farming, silk thread (usually totaling hundreds of metres from each cocoon) is spun off from the cocoons after they've been boiled, but we are using the totally unprocessed cocoons.
The diffuser is formed of a random configuration of silk cocoons, each of which is attached to a hand soldered wire matrix. The process starts by attaching the silk cocoons to strands of wire. The first strands are then attached to a hand brushed stainless steel frame, and the layers of silk cocoon slowly built up, checking the overall form of the piece all along the way.The colour of the material is a soft white that yellows a little with age. To clean diffusers in this material, we recommend that they be dusted or lightly vacuumed. The diffuser can also be removed and taken to a specialist dry cleaner.

Rattan

From strands of rattan, the skin is peeled off and the remaining "core" of the rattan is formed into 1 mm diameter wires in an extrusion process.
The rattan wires are then formed into diffusers starting with a base structure, and using the random weave technique that we've developed.
The colour of the extruded material is a soft yellow that deepens a little with age. To clean diffusers in this material, we recommend that they be dusted or lightly vacuumed.

Mulberry tree bark

The branches of the mulberry shrubs are harvested in the autumn, and the innermost layer of bark (white bark) is stripped from the timber and boiled in a mixture of water and soda ash. The strips are then beaten by hand until they have been well separated.
The diffuser is formed by hand sewing each of the prepared clusters of fiber to a cotton grid, which has been fastened to the base structure.
The colour of the material is a soft white that yellows a little with age. To clean diffusers in this material, we recommend that they be dusted or lightly vacuumed.

Hand cast polymer

A non toxic water based polymer is used in a hand casting process, and is built up in layers on a mould.
As a reinforcement to the material, rattan wires or silk cocoon hemispheres are embedded into the material.
The colour of the material is a soft white that yellows a little with age. To clean diffusers in this material, we recommend that they be lightly vacuumed or wiped with a damp cloth.

Hand soldered wire matrix

This material comprises a self supporting hand soldered steel wire matrix which is then coated with nickel or gold.
The colour of the material in nickel finish is a warm silver colour, while the gold finish is a yellowish hue.
To clean items in this material, we recommend that they be lightly vacuumed or dusted with a dry duster, and they can also be very gently washed in warm water.

Hand soldered wire matrix interwoven metalised thread

This lighting diffuser material consists of a hand soldered steel wire matrix which is then nickel coated, before being interwoven with metalised thread.
The colour of the material is a lustrous silver colour. To clean diffusers in this material, we recommend that they be lightly vacuumed or dusted with a dry duster, and they can also be very gently washed in warm water.
